I had a quick look in the webmin demo and that seems OK.
I have saw that you have access to the apache administration and that you can specify the document root for each virtual host.
So the answer is probably YES.

Perhaps there is customers that already use it and that could confirm that by a post a reply to your request.

Webmin is a little more do-it-yourself when it comes to configurations. So if you are familiar with the Apache configs, it will work fine. I don't recommend it for a beginner or someone who does not know how to navigate the myriad of configuration options available.

We're using Webmin to host JMS (version 1.2 now) sites (subdomains and separate domains) and it seems to be working fine.
